

Cliff Notes: 4.2 Internalisation

Internalisation frames discipline as something that should be carried by the person, yet the data repeatedly question how deep, moral, and stable that inner quality is.

CLAIM

Discipline becomes carried by the person

Participants move from external obedience

MAJORITY

Most accounts frame it as ingrained

Most participants describe discipline as

DOUBT

Conformity may hide dissent

Outward conformity does not prove inward

ELASTICITY

The concept widens too far

Discipline expands into money, poverty,

Internalisation claim

Participants conceptualised discipline as an inner quality, but not a simple one. It could be innate, ingrained, strategic, morally neutral, over-extended, or context-dependent.

MINORITY

One account frames discipline as innate

Dwayne Andrews presents discipline as

DURABILITY

Repetition produces consistency

Daily effort, drill, habit, brain memory,

MORAL LIMIT

Discipline can be morally indifferent

Gang members and wrongdoers may be highly

CONTEXT

Discipline varies across settings

Home, community, observation, values, and

Internalisation claim

Participants conceptualised discipline as an inner quality, but not a simple one. It could be innate, ingrained, strategic, morally neutral, over-extended, or context-dependent.

One-line argument: internalisation is discipline as carried conduct, but the theme exposes how uncertain that carrying becomes when context, morality, and observation change.
